PART III. Exemplary Practices

EXEMPLARY PRACTICES Describe any exemplary practices that your school would be willing to share with other NEASC member schools.

Redesign of the Instructional Leadership Team:

This past year, the school has engaged in a restructuring of its ILT in order to better advance both the school's growth areas as well as its transformation plan. During its implementation, teacher leaders were encouraged to join from multiple grades and program areas throughout the school. A review of past practice clarified the need for a successful ILT to have a clear, practical objective and to ensure that the teacher leaders involved should all have time and space for voice. Structured rolling agendas, consistent meeting times, allowing feedback from staff to improve action, and planned adult learning around the goal of "literacy" were key actions in planning and implementation. ILT focused on rolling out Reciprocal Teaching as a “best practice” method to promote greater reading comprehension and literacy and developed a number of professional development sessions to support staff in implementing this model. The ILT also used a peer observation protocol to visit reciprocal teaching in action as well as report back to the greater group ways "RT" could be more differentiated for teachers.

The main challenge this year was to shift the mindset of the ILT from a passive group to an active cohort of teacher leaders. The underlying focus of school leaders who organized ILT was to build the capacity for the participants to readily embrace their role as key instructional leaders who could lead adult learning and be the prime movers of the reciprocal teaching strategy amongst their peers. As a result of this more inclusive ILT model, we found that more educators were involved in the literacy strategies that ILT produced than prior district-led professional development. In addition, district goals around literacy became more personalized and had more ownership when ILT used adult-learning strategies to engage staff.
